If you had seen him, you would have thought that he was only a little man with rather a large head and a funny cap on; but he was an elf, who lived in the mountain, and he now took a little silver whistle from his pocket and gave a long and distinct signal, which could be heard far away. He had scarcely ceased whistling, when suddenly a great many little people just like him stood by his side, as if they had sprung from the ground, and asked him what he wanted of them; for he was their chief, and he told them his wish. Then they began to dig, and shovel, and carry loads, and soon the little house and garden with its bench under the linden-tree...
