Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .pigeons, the causative agent of goose cholera was pathogenic in average doses, for geese only, and for rabbits in large doses only. They thus concluded that the organisms were different, though related, and that the virus of goose cholera had become fixed at a degree less virulent than that of fowls. Lignieres (1900), however, believed that the organism of these authors could not be placed in the Pasteurella group. The first reference to the typhoid-like diseases of birds in which the organism is given a definite name is that of E. Klein, in 1889, who presents the details of an extensive epidemic among fowls in Kent, England. The mortality which developed in March, 1888, eventually reached over 400. With the exception of the leukemic condition, the clinical symptoms and the post mortem findings agree well with those presented by Moore (1895) for his infectious leukemia of fowls. Klein s description of the causative organism (Bacillus gallinarum), its occurrence in the blood, morphology, staining characteristics, inoculation experiments and cultural features in the few medias available for bacteriological use at that time, make it appear highly probable that he worked with the same bacterium which Moore described several years later under the head of. Bacterium sanguinarium, the causative agent of infectious leukemia in the United States. Klein also studied in 1889, an epidemic among Scottish grouse. From these cases he obtained a small motile rod measuring 0.6 to 1.5 microns, which he termed B. scoticus. In 1889 Reick...
