Wm; Walter Phelps, of New Jersey: February 1, 1884; House of Representatives* Mr. Phelps said: Mr. Chairman: Speaking for the one most interested, I express his deep regret for the unkind allusions to the living and the dead which have been made in the heat of this discussion. In his long search for justice he has carefully avoided any reflection upon those who have impeded him in the pursuit, and he refuses to accept any responsibility for these allusions, whether made by those who are friendly or those who are unfriendly to the bill. And may I not assume that if those who had made them had the floor they, too, would express their regret: the gentleman from New York [Mr. Slocum] who has charge of the bill, that he reflected upon the great war minister, whose great faults history will pardon for his greater achievements; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Steele], that, in his surprise at finding that a general on the board of examination viewed the evidence different from him, he intimated that he looked at the evidence with an eye upon the Presidency; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Cutcheon], that he checked the course of his strong argument to intimate that there was another general who wished to be reinstated; my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. McAdoo], a young Rupert in debate, that he suggested that a conviction of the military incompetency of still another general was a universal condition of sanity; my peaceful friend from Michigan [Mr. Hour], that he confessed that he could think just as General Grant did in everything, except in military matters; and...
