I shall merely add to these practical extracts the opinion expressed by Sir Robert Kane. Sir R. Kane. There is twice as much Flax imported into Great Britain from foreign parts as there is grown in this country, and yet there is no actual impediment to its cultivation, for it appears to be uniformly a remunerating crop where attended with ordinary care, and may, by the proper application of scientific principles to its culture, be rendered one of the least expensive or exhausting crops that the agriculturist can have to do with. And at another page, f he observes: Flax returns all The agriculturist should...
